private companies to prevent WMD attacks. In making the rounds, the coordinators share prevailing threats and become key points of contact when a suspicious incident arises in the WMD arena.

"Our WMD coordinators are the face of the Bureau when they go out and meet the locals," said Chris Freeze, assistant special agent in charge of the Houston Division, who participated in the exercise.

Bruce Shelton, the facility manager, had never dealt with most of the individuals or agencies that participated in the exercise. Seeing the response unfold in front of him gave him a fresh perspective on his own role in securing his site and helping in a coordinated response.

"There are a lot of resources out there that I haven't used until now," he said after the scenario concluded. "It's good to know where they're at and who they are."
