revealed hundreds of food riots during the Industrial Revolution. Today's struggles over food are again making headlines. Join Bohstedt for a discussion of Food Politics: What everyone needs to know by Robert Paarlberg in Knox County Public Library's Book Sandwiched In, Wednesday, April 16, 12:00 p.m. in the East Tennessee History Center auditorium, at 601 South Gay Street.

"As they did 250 years ago, the social drama of riots brings on stage political forces, conflicts and actors we may not have recognized," he says. "To the world's hungry people, we can seem like an elephant rolling over in its sleep and crushing millions."

Bohstedt thinks most Americans are probably unaware of the offstage dramas of food politics, dramas that are brought to light in the book Food Politics. "Paarlberg shows us how politics shapes our food chain – from abundance to obesity to e-coli to organic foods to farm bills to Freedom fries.

"Paarlberg raises important questions," Bohstedt says, "such as, how do our farmers – and the 'American food regime' – and ethanol -- and our menus – affect hungry Asians and Africans? Is 'food aid' a blessing or a curse? Why doesn't 'free-trade' doctrine cover food? What about those 'Frankenfoods'? What might sustainable farming look like? Are we approaching the abyss of chronic food crisis or the sunny fields of the "green revolution?"

"Food is such a basic driver of human affairs," says Bohstedt. "I was lucky enough to teach history at UTK – the histories of England, Ireland, the World, and especially – riots. As I studied food riots in early modern England, I found that customary episodes of crowd violence were a form of bargaining between the common people and their rulers, indeed a first draft of the welfare state. Like 'our' recent food riots of 2008, they were politics from the gut where hunger meets outrage."

Bohstedt says he has always been fascinated by community politics – how ordinary folks struggle together to get things done – whether it's electing an official, building a church, or organizing a softball game.

The discussion will continue on May 21 when Joan Hemingway, University of Tennessee's W.P. Toms Distinguished Professor of Law, will explore ways to build a more cooperative, humane, and positive future detailed in the book Conscious Capitalism: Liberating the Heroic Spirit of Business by John Mackey.

On April 8, 2014 Officer from the Loudon Police Department encountered a silver Chevy sedan which appeared to be disabled at Hwy 72 and the southbound entrance ramp to I-75. Officers stopped to check on the occupants of the vehicle and discovered Thomas J. Davenport 4th and George Ray Eveans Jr. in the vehicle.

In the vehicle with the duo were two large televisions, several Xbox gaming systems, at least two dozen games for the systems, a laptop computer and other various small electronics. There was also a 9mm handgun discovered under the front seat of the vehicle.

Eveans and Davenport gave conflicting accounts as to how they came to be in possession of these items. Both men were arrested and charged with unlawful possession of a weapon, and the other items were seized pending further investigation.

On April 9th Loudon Police Detectives were able to identify the legitimate owners of the property and discovered the items were taken on April 8 during a residential burglary in the City of Knoxville.

Loudon Detectives are working with the KPD to return the property to the rightful owner and explore additional criminal charges against Davenport and Evans.

Thomas Davenport, 30, Kendale Drive Chattanooga, was charged with Unlawful Possession of a Weapon.

George Eveans, 26, Kendale Drive Chattanooga, was charged with Unlawful Possession of a Weapon.

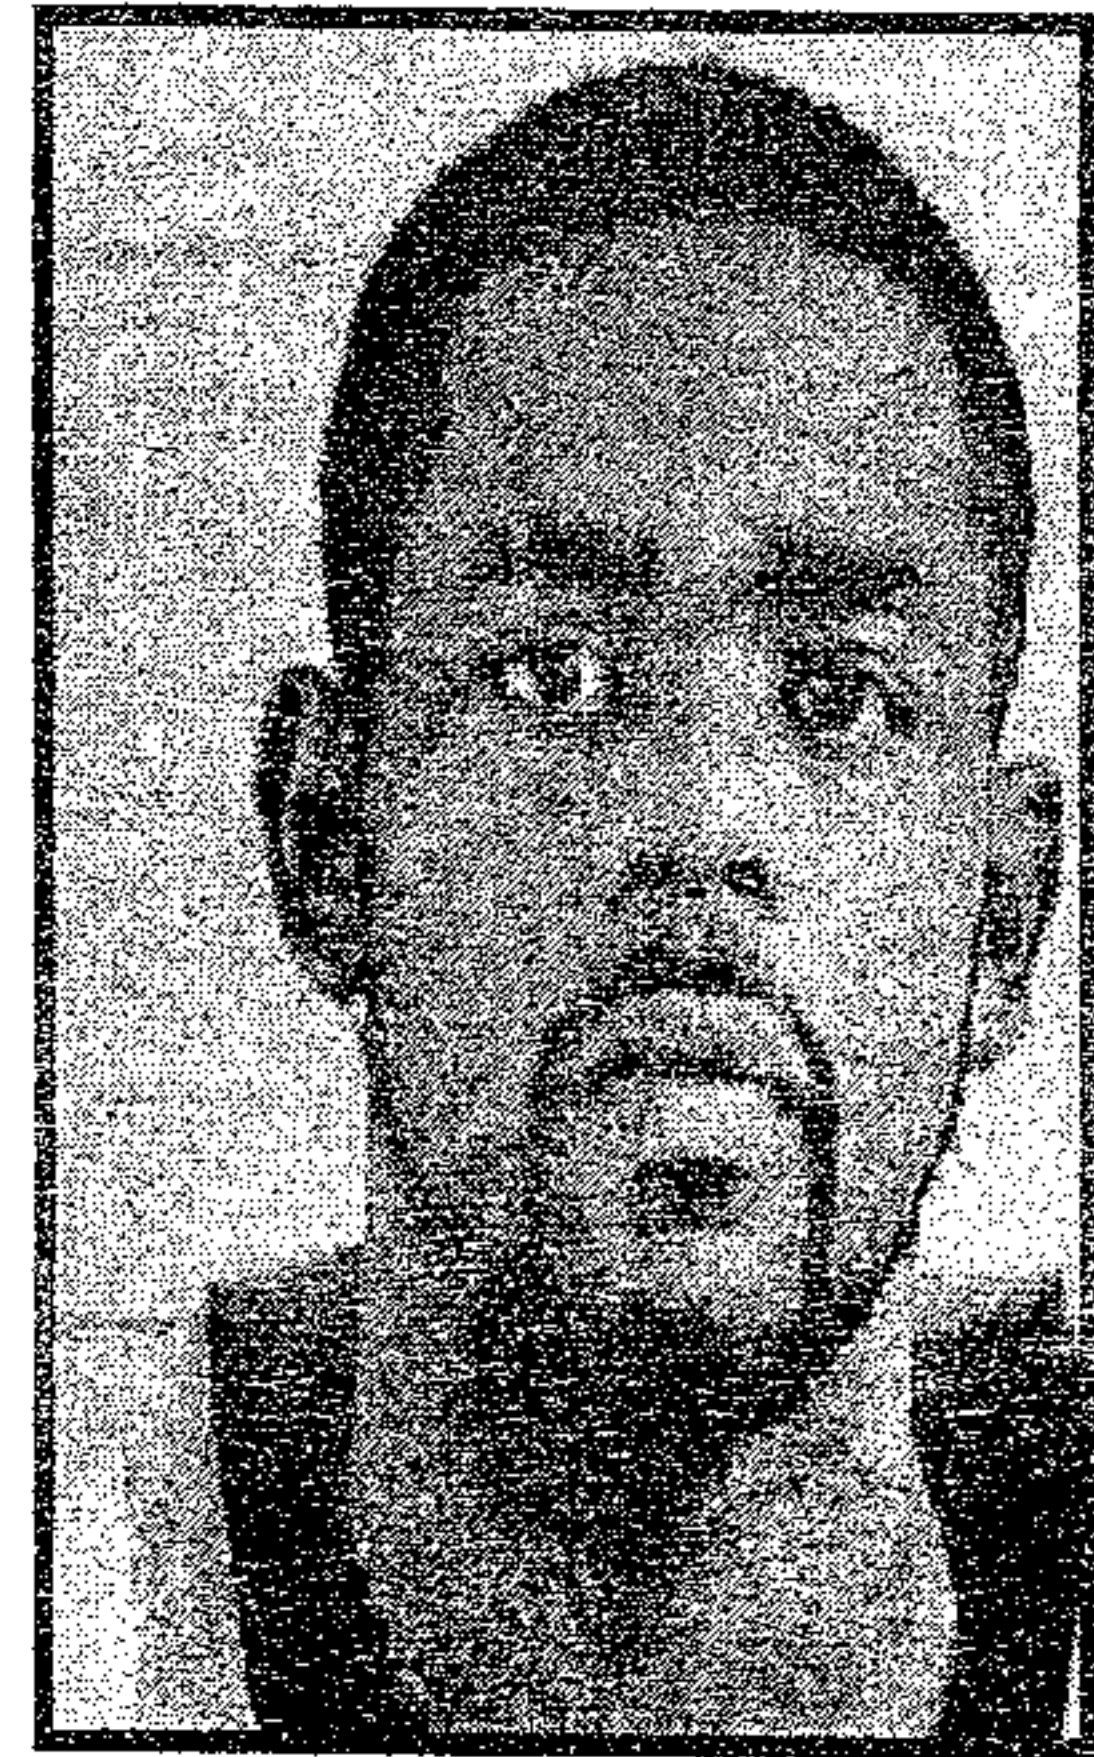

According to the report, Officer April Farmer LPD, observed

Thomas Davenport and the other subject as George Eveans. Officer ran both subjects through the NCIC database for Warrants Mr. Davenport did come back with a Warrant out of Georgia but there was no extradition outside 25 miles from Ga. After the vehicle turned onto Pond Creek the vehicle then was traveling well below the posted speed limit as well as the vehicle did hit the fog line.

It was at this point Deputy did conduct a traffic stop on the afore mentioned vehicle on Pond Creek at Dry Valley. After making contact with the driver, Robert Watts, there was a strong odor of alcoholic beverage coming from the vehicle. While Watts was attempting to obtain his driver's license, registration and proof of insurance he was unable to multi task and talk while looking for documentation. Watts was also slow to respond and had difficulty using his fine motor skills to retrieve the documents. Deputy did then ask Watts to exit the vehicle in order to ascertain if the odor of alcoholic beverage was coming for Watts or his passenger. After Watts exited the vehicle, the odor of alcoholic beverage was still present and more pronounced when Watts would speak. Watts had difficulty walking back to this Deputies in a straight line and while speaking to Watts Deputy did observe that Watts had red watery bloodshot eyes and slightly slurred speech. Deputy did have Watts perform Standardized Field Sobriety Tasks, which Watts provided multiple clues too. Investigation determined that the city created a climate that made the thefts easier by allowing Broome to handle all aspects of financial transactions. Good bookkeeping practices call for multiple people to be involved in money-handling procedures so they can check each other's work and increase accountability. "This is another example of what can go wrong when local governments don't have good systems of checks and balances when handling money," Comptroller Justin P. Wilson said.

"Even small communities need to follow sound practices. Simply trusting employees to do the right thing leaves public money at risk."
