A Relationship Made Simple

If someone were to ask you today if you were confident about spending eternity in heaven when this life is over, what would you say? I expect that over 90 percent of those asked would say yes, they are sure about their salvation.

sure, most of those same people would refer to a prayer that was prayed however many years ago. Many would say they have invited Jesus into their heart and that is all that is required for entrance into eternal paradise.

If asked how they are the correct path to salvation, wouldn't doing so change everything about the way you think, speak and act? Would your life still look exactly like it did before the Holy Spirit of God took up residence in your heart? If someone professes to know Christ but their life has absolutely no reflection of Him, is it possible for that person to be eternally wrong, deceived and actually headed directly for an eternity separated from God?

It is my personal belief that there are really three kinds of people: Those who have accepted Christ and experience a true relationship with Him, those who are lost without Christ and desperately need to consider the eternity of their soul and then there are those who have truly made a profession of faith in Christ at some point but have had no one to teach them, lead them and show them how to grow in that relationship with our Savior.

Today's message is for that third group, and it may possibly include you! I am convinced that many folks reading today believe that Jesus is the Son of a God and that He died for our sins, rose from the grave and that salvation is obtained through faith in Him as Lord and Savior. I believe many folks have invited

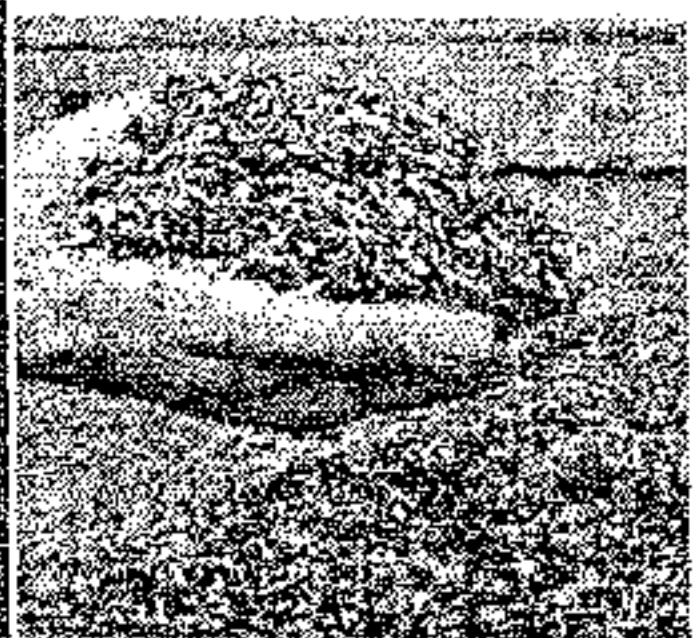

Christ into their lives and would consider that the pinnacle of their Christian walk. But in reality, the day we accept Jesus is only the first day of a living, breathing relationship between a believer and the Savior of the world that should grow and mature with every day. Yes, we believers get to spend eternity with Him in heaven but that relationship begins the moment we trust in Jesus for salvation. If that relationship is not evident then a person has either not sought to build on it or it never existed in the first place. The day we stand before God would be a horrible time to discover that we never began the relationship after all.

I have heard many pastors compare our relationship with Christ to our relationship with our wives. If I profess to love my wife one day, and then went on back to my everyday life without spending any when he noticed that someone had cut his chain link fence. There was a building that had been broken into beside this property and there was tracks leading to the suspects house that had already been arrested for stealing some of these items. Also Deputy did witness two large pieces of metal approx 8 foot long with hooks and a white cabinet laying beside the cut fence that appeared to come out of the Wilkerson appliance store that was broken into. TGN ctd from pg. 3 time with her, I would most likely not have a wife for very long and apparently wasn't really looking for a relationship in the first place! How can we say that we know Christ, that we trust in Christ and have a relationship with Him if we never acknowledge Him, speak with Him or allow Him to speak to us?

I recently had a Christ follower tell me that his prayer life consisted of a "God is great, God is good" prayer method only, and he has been a Christian for many years. Having a prayer life consisting of a model prayer that we teach our five year olds does not make a person unsaved but it absolutely means that they are not really experiencing a relationship with Jesus Christ! If my conversation with Blondie only consisted of me saying, "I Jeff, take you Blondie, to be my lawfully wedded wife", I would have been single by the end of the first week! A relationship is not a broken record of meaningless words spoken to satisfy a prayer requirement in front of others. A relationship consists of spending time together, sharing burdens, dreams, plans, hopes and intimate moments together. This is the kind of relationship that Jesus wants to have with us as believers.

So, how can we begin today to either build our relationship with the Savior or to discover that we have never really established one and then act accordingly?

A Relationship made Simple..... Here it is..... Spend time with Jesus!!!!!!

First, dedicate a few moments of everyday to speak to God through prayer. Don't just give Him your wish list or recite a child's model prayer, share your deepest thoughts, your exciting moments, your struggles and be real with Christ. He already knows these things but He wants you to share them with Him and then allow Him to respond. After praying, sit still for a moment and allow God to speak with you during your prayer time. The results might just surprise you!

Secondly, take a few moments each day to read God's word. I encourage new believers or those just starting to experience God to start reading the New Testament from the beginning and read small bits each day like one or two chapters. Read the same chapter twice and then chew on what you have read all day asking God to help you understand what you are reading.

I know, many people say, "I read it, but just can't understand it!" To those folks I respond as follows: Get an easier to read version such as an ESV or a HCSB. I use the NKJV study Bible and understand it much better than a King James Version. (Boy I'm asking for it with that last sentence from the traditional Baptists but we'll save that discussion for another day)

I encourage you to pray before opening God's word and seek forgiveness for any sin standing between you and the Savior. Ask the Holy Spirit to reveal Himself to you through the word and then read slow. The person who does not believe God speaks to us through His word has not spent much time in God's word.

There are many wonderful aspects to learning how to grow in our walk with Christ, but these two are fundamental and by far the most important way to begin a relationship with our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

I encourage you to spend time with Jesus, allow Him to spend time with you and let me know if your disappointed at the end of thirty days. I won't be looking for your call.

The Testing That Wasn't

New York Man Falsifies Test Data on Military Equipment

Technology enhances the U.S. military's ability to protect our nation. That technology, however, is traditionally subject to stringent testing measures to ensure it operates the way it's supposed to.

Unfortunately, one testing manager employed by a government contractor in western New York decided, on his own, that the testing requirements imposed by the Department of Defense (DOD) on his company were unnecessary, so he cut corners. And when the FBI and our military partners got wind of his actions, the ensuing joint investigation resulted in that testing manager's guilty plea and subsequent federal prison term. He was also ordered to pay nearly $300,000 in restitution for the retesting costs incurred by the military.

Steve Wysocki personally oversaw product testing for two specific projects—the KG-40 military radio system and the SH-60 Sonobuoy system. The KG-40 is a tactical radio encryption system used by the U.S. Army and Navy and also sold for export to foreign countries, while the SH-60 is an anti-submarine warfare device that includes a small sonar unit usually released into the ocean from an aircraft.

In 2011, the FBI received information about possible falsification of testing data for the KG-40 radio system. Teaming up with investigators from the Army Criminal Investigation Division's Major Procurement Fraud Unit, the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, and the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, we began looking into the allegations.

The investigation, which involved extensive reviews of company testing records and numerous interviews with company employees and others, revealed how the data was falsified. Here's how it worked:

Among the testing protocols imposed by DOD for the KG-40 and SG-60 is something called vibration testing—component parts being placed on a vibration table for a certain period of time to ensure they can survive real-world combat conditions on aircraft and ships.

During vibration testing, the components are hooked up to a computer that monitors performance and produces a profile. Because of testing variables, no two items will produce the same exact testing profile.

Wysocki admitted to personally falsifying vibration test profiles—and directing subordinates to do the same—for components of the KG-40 and SH-60 systems by using testing profiles from previous items and simply changing the serial number, date, and time of the test. These phony profiles were then inserted into each component's "traveler file," which accompanies it throughout the assembly and testing process. Each tested item needs a copy of a passing vibration table profile in its file before it can be released to the military. Wysocki even had a name for his non-testing procedure: "phantom vibe testing."

To justify the phantom vibe testing to his workers, Wysocki told them that the testing of certain components could be skipped because those types of components had no reported failures detected during vibration testing. He also told them he was trying to clear up a backlog and that the units needed to move along the line quicker.

But no matter how Wysocki tried to justify his actions to his subordinates—or perhaps to himself—he broke the law. And as U.S. Attorney William Hochul, Jr., Western District of New York, put it, "This office will not tolerate anybody who, by their actions, hurts or impacts the products used by our military men and women to carry out their critical mission."
