explosives-laden Nissan Pathfinder used in a failed attempt to bomb New York City's Times Square in 2010. Parts of the homemade bomb—propane tanks, alarm clocks, and a pressure cooker—can be seen inside the vehicle. Also on display will be items from the 2013 Boston Marathon bombing, including the handcuffs that restrained bomber Dzhokhar Tsarnaev.

More than 45 new artifacts have been added to the exhibit, which focuses on terrorism as well as recent espionage cases—such as the Russian spy investigation known as Operation Ghost Stories—and cyber cases, like Silk Road, in which the FBI dismantled a secret website that allowed individuals to buy and sell illegal drugs anonymously online.

“The FBI has had a long and successful partnership with the Newseum,” said Mike Kortan, FBI assistant director of public affairs. “We are pleased that the expanded exhibit provides even more opportunity for people to learn about the FBI and our mission to protect the country.”

The Newseum's original Bureau-related exhibit, “G-Men and Journalists: Top News Stories of the FBI's First Century,” debuted in 2008 and was updated in 2011. In July 2015, the exhibit closed for renovations and opens today in a larger space with more than 160 artifacts, most of which are on loan from the FBI.

The “G-Men and Journalists” exhibit was intended to be temporary but was so popular its run was extended indefinitely. Millions of people have seen it. Other items still on display from the original exhibit include the Unabomber's cabin; engine parts and landing gear from United Airlines Flight 175, which crashed into the World Trade Center South Tower on 9/11; and the hiking boots worn by “shoe bomber” Richard Reid, who received al Qaeda training to blow up an American Airlines flight from Paris to Miami in December 2001. The belts passengers (see FBI ctd. pg. 5)
