their names neither one could tell him who they were or where they lived. At that time the complainant then took the children back to his residence and gave them a bath, fed them and put clothes on them. DCS then arrived and took the children into custody. At that time Deputy Bowen and Lt. Jeff Vittatoe, LCSD Criminal Investigation Division (CID) then tried to locate the children's parents. They went to an Old Greenback Road residence and upon walking up to the house the front door was open and they made contact with Sara McKelvey when she came to the door and appeared half asleep.

At that time Lt. Vittatoe asked her if she had any children and she stated she did and then he asked if she knew where they were and she began to cry and asked where they were. She then ran to the bedroom which she was also sleeping in and found that neither one of the children were there.

Lt. Vittatoe then explained that DCS had her children in custody. McKelvey never asked if they were okay and where they had found them she just wanted to see them. Ms. McKelvey stated she had fell back asleep around 6am but they usually woke her up when they got up. When officers arrived at the residence it was around 10:19am. McKelvey was taken into custody and charged with aggravated child neglect for children under the age of 8. Deputy Jerramie Bowen, LCSD made the arrest.

"The best way to determine whether or not a field is legal to hunt is to ensure that the field has been planted by legitimate agricultural practices, as recommended by the University of Tennessee Agricultural Extension Service. If a crop has been planted or harvested in a recommended manner, it is legal to hunt. However, if grain has been placed on the ground in piles or strips, is inconsistently distributed, or placed for the purpose of attracting doves, this is not a normal agricultural practice and would be considered bait," explained Richardson.

Wheat is sown at this time of the year in Tennessee as a standard agricultural practice and fields of freshly sown wheat offer excellent hunting opportunity. But, the hunter must be certain that the field has not been "double sown" which is not a recommended method of planting. If the hunter sees that wheat has already sprouted consistently on the field and hard grains of wheat are also distributed on top of the ground, it is evidence that the field has been sown more than one time.

The hunter should depart such fields immediately.

Federal regulations also permit the taking of doves over wildlife food plots provided they are planted in accordance with official recommendations of the Agricultural Extension Service or in a manner consistent with official recommendations for production of a crop (example: one-time sowing of viable seed at recommended application rates and dates on a prepared seed bed).

Mature wildlife food plots may also be manipulated for the purpose of attracting and hunting doves. However, the distribution of additional grain, such as wheat or sunflower, to a standing or manipulated food plot would be considered baiting.

In addition to state law violations, federal penalties for a violation of the Migratory Bird Treaty Act include a fine up to $15,000 and 6 months imprisonment. The penalty for placing or directing the placement of bait, or allowing any person to take or attempt to take doves over a baited area includes up to one-year imprisonment.

If a hunter has any doubt that a field may be baited, the best thing to do is leave the area and contact your closest Tennessee Wildlife Resources Agency Office.
