Where the Nation's Bomb Techs Learn the Tools of the Trade

The bomb threat at an Alabama strip mall was met by a robust response—bomb technicians from around the country armed with X-ray gear, robot technology, and the latest intelligence about improvised explosive devices.

The exercise, held on the training grounds of the FBI's Hazardous Devices School at Redstone Arsenal in Huntsville, was a scenario designed to inform new and experienced bomb technicians on the myriad threats they could face on the job. The school, established in 1971 and run jointly by the FBI and the U.S. Army until last

Bomb

September, when the FBI accepted primary responsibility, has provided training to more than 20,000 local, state, and federal first responders and bomb techs. It is the only facility in the country that trains and certifies the nation's public safety bomb technicians.

"The Hazardous Devices School places the FBI in a unique position," said Special Agent John Stewart, the school's director. "Our state and local law enforcement partners depend on us to provide this training, so we have a commitment to getting it right."

The facility is home to a sprawling 455-acre campus complete with classrooms, explosive ranges, and mock villages that include a train station, apartment complexes, a movie theater, and a strip mall. New bomb technicians spend six weeks learning about electricity, fuses, and improvised explosives. Their certification ensures they will be operating from the same playbook as every other bomb tech in the country.

During one recent exercise, students searching a village bookstore found a pressure cooker similar to one used in the Boston Marathon bombing in 2013, along with crude bomb-making material and anti-government propaganda. They had to devise an approach: Disable it in place? Remove it? The scenarios are often developed based on real-world events.

Across campus, another group of trainees learns how to remotely navigate robots on stairs and through a maze of barriers. The exercise simulates how bomb techs may have to pilot robots through multi-floor buildings and confined spaces.

"This is an ever-changing syllabus for the students, because we want them to learn what we know based on intelligence and teach them those skills in the real world," said Mark Vargas, an instructor at the school.

A mixture of classroom and field training ensures the trainees are ready to handle dangerous threats when they return home.

"Our goal is, if they leave here on Friday and go to work on Monday and they get a bomb call, they should feel absolutely comfortable—based on the training they receive—that they're going to survive that call and go home," said Stewart.

Detective Robert Rodriguez, a bomb technician for the Miami Police Department, recently attended a refresher course at the Hazardous Devices School, repeatedly donning an 80-pound protective suit under the hot Alabama sun. Technicians must be recertified every three years. In one exercise, he helped his squad move a pressure cooker bomb with a robot so it could be detonated remotely inside a sandbag bunker.

"The advanced techniques and technology they provide have made us more proficient over the years," said Rodriguez. "We've become much better at our jobs."

The FBI is upgrading and expanding the school, which has trained each of the country's 3,100 bomb technicians—a figure that does not include the military's explosive ordnance disposal (EOD) technicians. The growth and expansion reflects the need to stay ahead of any emerging threats.

"As threats evolve and become more advanced, the Hazardous Devices School is poised to meet those threats head on," Stewart said. "We're here to serve our state and local partners. They're our first line of defense and we'll continue to provide everything they need to be successful."
