Sevierville resident sentenced to serve 222 months in prison for child pornography offenses and attempted enticement of a minor for illegal sex

On January 18, 2018, Michael Anthony Carpenter, 29, of Sevierville, Tennessee, was sentenced by the Honorable Thomas A. Varlan, Chief U.S. District Judge, to serve 222 months in prison for advertising and distributing child pornography and attempted enticement of a minor to engage in illegal sexual activity. Following his release from prison, the U.S. Probation Office will supervise him for the rest of his life. He will also be required to register with the sex offender registry in any state in which he resides, works, or attends school.

Carpenter pleaded guilty in August 2017 to federal charges stemming from two separate investigations. An

Behind-the-Scenes Look at Planning and Partnerships

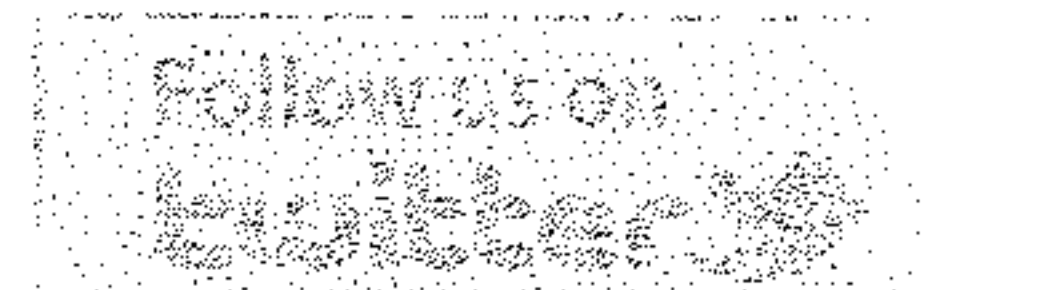

On the wintry streets of downtown Minneapolis, ice crunches underfoot. The wind is whipping, and the temperature hovers in the teens. The weather will be one of the many topics under discussion inside the city's convention center, where officials from every local, state, and federal organization involved with security at this year's Super Bowl have gathered to put their planning and preparation to the test.

With the big game just around the corner, participants at this recent day-long exercise—the first time everyone has come together under one roof—will be asked to simulate their agency's responses to a variety of scenarios, from an active shooter event to reuniting a missing child with a parent to keeping fans and first responders warm in the frigid Minnesota winter.

Nearly two years of planning has taken place, largely behind the scenes, to make sure that Super Bowl LII—and the 10 days of events leading up to the kickoff at U.S. Bank Stadium on February 4—is safe and secure. Nothing has been left to chance, not even the weather.

“An event like this is about planning, about preparation, and about wife Mrs. Heather Lynn Philip (who he co habituates with) had pointed his JC Higgins 22 long rifle at him when he returned from his sons residence. She then attacked him, ripped his clothing off him, and scratched him on his neck and legs. He then went to the front porch and called 911 while she beat the door with the weapon. Victim stated that his ex wife (Mrs Philip) had placed him in fear of his life.

This Deputy observed marks on the door and walls consistent with the muzzle of a rifle. There were signs of a struggle in the living room and victim shredded overalls lying in the floor. Upon this Deputy's entrance in the residence a back door was heard to slam. This Deputy investigated and saw a white female traveling through the woods behind the home. The residence was cleared and all attempts to locate Mrs Philip were exhausted.

All Deputies cleared the scene and approximately 45 minutes later victim called and stated that Mrs Philip had partnerships," said Rick Thornton, special agent in charge of the FBI's Minneapolis Division. "Each organization brings its unique abilities to the table, but it requires tremendous teamwork and cooperation to pull everything together into a unified whole."

"I think we have done our best to think of just about every contingency, natural or man-made," said MPD's Scott Gerlicher, overall public safety coordinator for Super Bowl LII. "The Super Bowl is just a massive operation, and very complicated," he explained, "especially in our area."

Few northern cities play host to the Super Bowl, and dealing with the likely extreme February cold is a necessity for police officers and first responders who will have to brave the elements out of doors (warming huts will be located near the venues). Fans attending the game will be pre-screened at indoor locations, such as the Mall of America, so they won't have to wait outside the stadium. Securing the stadium itself is challenging because, unlike in many cities, U.S. Bank Stadium is located in the heart of downtown Minneapolis, making the establishment of a secure perimeter difficult.

"We make sure everybody understands what their roles and responsibilities are," Gerlicher said, "and talk through some scenarios to make sure that between now and when we go live with our full, 10-day operational period in late January, we can identify any gaps and deal with them."

Gerlicher's counterpart at the FBI is Joe Rivers, an assistant special agent in charge in the Minneapolis Division who for the past two years has led a dedicated team of agents and professional staff to make sure the Bureau's piece of the Super Bowl security puzzle is complete—and fits seamlessly into MPD's overall plan.

The FBI's main responsibilities include taking the lead in any kind of terrorist, cyber, or major crime incident, and providing intelligence, from both a national and international perspective, about bad actors who might seek to disrupt Super Bowl activities.

"We have planned for this to ensure that nothing happens," Rivers said. "But if something does happen, some kind of mass casualty incident or terrorism event, then there is a huge shift built into the program to continue to support the event but to transition to crisis response and investigation."

The FBI has also offered other expertise and resources, including taking responsibility for credentialing thousands of public safety officers and volunteers who will need varying levels of access to Super Bowl venues.

For the FBI as a whole, however, preparing for major events is nothing new. The Bureau's Critical Incident Response Group (CIRG) maintains teams of agents and experts who specialize in helping to secure major events such as political conventions and the Olympics.

CIRG personnel operate out of the spotlight but stand ready to respond to emergency situations. On hand for the Super Bowl, said Special Agent Mike Hartnett, who heads a crisis management team at CIRG, "will be tactical teams, bomb techs, people that can respond to a hazardous device incident—we'll bring the whole wealth of response that the FBI can bring."

"Most agencies deal with events like a Super Bowl maybe once in a career or once in a lifetime," Special Agent in Charge Thornton said, "where collectively the FBI deals with these things on an ongoing basis. The fact that we have the ability to reach back to the entire FBI with its specialty components, as well as all the other offices, to augment our resources is what makes the FBI unique."

Raising Awareness About Human Trafficking

In the summer of 2016, a group of Minnesota community leaders from the public, private, and non-profit sector joined with local and federal law enforcement agencies to form an anti-trafficking group to address the issue of sex trafficking at this year's Super Bowl in Minneapolis.

Although the group established practical goals of providing more outreach and emergency services to help victims, one of its primary objectives was to raise awareness about sex trafficking—and to educate the public that the problem exists not just at major sporting events but throughout the year in communities all around country.

"We don't want to blame the Super Bowl," said Amanda Koonjeharry, who works for Hennepin County, which encompasses Minneapolis, where Super Bowl LII will be played. "It's not the game that is causing the issue," she said. "Sex trafficking is happening 365 days a year."

undercover law enforcement task force in Australia first identified Carpenter in the spring of 2016, after he posted hyperlinks to his online storage account in a chat room devoted to exchanging child pornography so others could download his cache of child pornography. Australian law enforcement officers provided information concerning his involvement to the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, Homeland Security Investigations (HSI). During a separate undercover investigation in May 2017, Carpenter contacted undercover law enforcement officers and expressed interest in paying to have sex with a child. He was arrested in Sevier County, Tennessee, when he arrived at a pre-arranged location to have sex with who he believed was a nine-year-old girl.

“Technological advances, particularly the Internet and mobile devices, have facilitated the sex trafficking of children by providing a convenient worldwide marketing channel,” said J. Douglas Overbey, U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District of Tennessee. “Individuals can now use online classifieds and social media to advertise, schedule, and purchase sexual encounters with minors. This individual committed some of the most serious criminal offenses perpetrated against the most vulnerable members of our society. This sentence sends a clear message that these crimes against children will continue to be vigorously investigated and prosecuted by the U.S. Attorney’s Office.”

The local investigation was conducted by HSI and Knoxville Police Department, with assistance from the Sevierville Police Department and Sevier County Sheriff’s Office. Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Morris represented the United States.

This case was brought as part of Project Safe Childhood, a nationwide initiative to combat the growing epidemic of child sexual exploitation and abuse launched in May 2006 by the Department of Justice. Led by U.S. Attorneys’ Offices and the Criminal Division’s Child Exploitation and Obscenity Section, Project Safe Childhood marshals federal, state and local resources to better locate, apprehend and prosecute individuals who exploit children via the Internet, as well as to identify and rescue victims. For more information about Project Safe Childhood, please visit www.projectsafefchildhood.gov.

coincide with the Super Bowl.

Koonjbeharry manages a county initiative called No Wrong Door, which works to prevent the sexual exploitation of young people. She represents one of approximately 40 organizations involved in the Super Bowl anti-trafficking group. Other participants include hospitals, businesses, non-profits, local police departments, and the FBI.

In the Twin Cities region, said Beth Holger-Ambrose, executive director of The Link—a Minneapolis non-profit that serves young people who have been trafficked—"the Super Bowl has brought an incredible, unprecedented awareness to the issue of trafficking."

To take advantage of that, The Link produced one of two public service announcements that have been publicized in the months leading up to the Super Bowl. "I Am Priceless" was created by young people who were victims of sex trafficking, Holger-Ambrose said, and is aimed at preventing young girls and boys from becoming sexually exploited.

A second public service announcement, "Don't Buy It," aims to discourage men from buying sex and believing misconceptions about women involved in prostitution. "Women are not products," it says. "Men are more than consumers."

Holger-Ambrose and Koonjbeharry recently briefed members of the FBI Minneapolis Division's Citizens Academy Alumni Association about human trafficking as well as the efforts of the Super Bowl anti-trafficking group. Both women told the audience that they regularly work with the FBI to help young victims.

"Human trafficking victims are a large part of the case load that we carry," said Lauren Schmitz, an FBI victim specialist in Minneapolis, explaining that she has worked with juvenile victims as young as 13 years old. "Trafficking happens every day of the year," she said. "The Super Bowl has brought an awareness to the issue here in the Twin Cities and in Minnesota."
