Brandon Coffman, 29, Tinnel Lane Lenoir City, was charged with Burglary x3, and Vandalism. Loudon County Sheriff Deputies responded to Tinnel Lane and found the residence vandalized and burglarized. This residence was deemed a nuisance property and all access points are covered with plywood. The Court has issued an injunction that doesn't allow anyone to occupy the residence until court matters are resolved. Deputy had found the plywood had been pried from the back garage door and the door pried open. Agents placed a camera at the property. Agent Fritts along with the Sheriff Deputies found the plywood to the garage window pried off and the window unit moved to gain access to the residence.

Agents Fritts Cpl. Fagiana, and Deputy Green located Brandon Coffman hiding beside a shed near Tinnel Lane. Agent read Coffman his Maranda Warning and Coffman agreed to speak with Agent. Coffman admitted to breaking into the residence on 3 separate occasions and taking a TV from the residence. Coffman was captured

Lemur

An intruder had used bolt cutters to open enclosures and release a group of capuchin monkeys and ring-tailed lemurs. The staff accounted for all but one of the animals—Isaac, the oldest ring-tailed lemur in North America. Ring-tailed lemurs typically live about 20 to 25 years; Isaac was 32 at the time.

“It was definitely alarming,” said Ethan Fisher, executive director of the Santa Ana Zoo. “He is a senior animal, and all of the primates have special care. They have specialized diets formulated for their species.” But Isaac wasn’t missing for long. Someone dropped him off in a plastic storage container in front of a hotel later that day. A note in the container explained that the lemur had been taken from the Santa Ana Zoo.

After Isaac’s safe return, the question remained—who took him?

A few months later, Aquinas Kasbar, 19, was arrested on unrelated charges and bragged to his bail agent that he’d stolen a lemur from the zoo. He even showed the bail agent a video on his phone of himself with the lemur, according to Detective Farshid Hashempour of the Santa Ana Police Department, who investigated the case as part of an FBI task force. Investigators learned that Kasbar had broken into the zoo with the intention of taking a monkey for a pet, but he couldn’t get any of the monkeys to go with him.

up on two legs, could have caused him harm.

“Those things in totality possibly could’ve caused the animal to die. Thankfully it was returned to the zoo, and the lemur is still alive and doing well,” Hashempour said.

“This case sent a message that we take protecting these endangered animals seriously.”

Luis Altamirano, special agent, FBI Los Angeles

While the crime may seem like a harmless prank, theft of an endangered animal is no joke—it’s a federal crime. And that’s where the FBI came in. With overwhelming evidence against him, including the cell phone video of himself with the lemur, Kasbar agreed to plead guilty to stealing an endangered species. Last month, he was sentenced to three months in prison.

“There are a shortage of these animals around the world, and that’s why they’ve been given these special protections,” said FBI Special Agent Luis Altamirano, who helped investigate the case out of the Los Angeles Field Office. “This case sent a message that we take protecting these endangered animals seriously.”

Fortunately for Isaac, his ordeal is behind him, and he is back in his home surrounded by five fellow lemurs with whom he loves to socialize.

“He seemed pretty unfazed by the adventure,” said Fisher, the zoo director. “Our vets looked at him and didn’t see any issues. Some animals are more sensitive than other to disturbances, but fortunately, Isaac was okay.”

from Smith’s person. Smith became very combative with Sgt. Hutchins by attempting to kick him and screaming obscenities at him. Deputies had to force Smith into the vehicle as she resisted. Upon speaking with the victim she advised Smith called and told her to come pick her up. Upon victim arriving to get Smith, victim advised Smith started hitting victim vehicle, hit victim and tried to choke victim. The victim did have red marks on her face and neck. Michele Smith was transported to the Loudon County Jail.
