American Legion Post 256

Lecturer and author, Rachael Yarnell Thompson as a guest speaker receives from American Legion Post 256 Commander, Robert Haldi a special memorabilia scarf depicting Tennessee wildflowers and pollinators hand painted by local artist Mary Ruden.

In a recent meeting American Legion Post 256 once again hosted lecturer and author, Rachael Yarnell Thompson. On this visit Mrs. Thompson conveyed the story of the "Berlin Candy Bomber". It's a heartwarming story of Colonel Gail Seymour "Hal" Halvorsen, now a retired officer and command pilot of the United States Air Force. Col Halvorsen gained fame by dropping candy to German children during the Berlin Airlift from 1948 to 1949. The children coined him with the names, "Candy Bomber" and "Uncle Wiggly Wings". Known as Wiggly Wings because that's how the children could distinguish his aircraft from the many others, he told them "I'll rock (wiggle) my wings. For additional information about the American Legion contact Commander Robert Haldi or visit the Post 256 website: www.tellicolake-post256.org.

peace I give to you.” It is hard to live in this world without hearts that are troubled or afraid, when even places of worship become targets of anger and violence.

Our text today both foreshadows and echoes Jesus’ post-resurrection gift of peace. Jesus promises new life and peace through the Spirit.

God repeatedly reaches out to us with a word of love, a breath of peace, that touches our places of grief, pain, and unrest. We are sent to reach out in turn to others with God’s peace that surpasses understanding. It is a deep peace even in times of unrest and sorrow. It is a peace that comes from knowing and trusting God. Jesus triumphed over sin and death; God will have the final word.

Prayer: God of peace, be at work through all of your children to breathe peace into troubled hearts and places so that all may know your peace, the peace that surpasses understanding. Amen.

study for senior-level law enforcement managers. The highly selective program is held on the same campus where new FBI special agents and intelligence analysts are trained to investigate threats in the U.S. and around the world.

“The gravest threats to society today—terrorism, drug trafficking, human trafficking, cyber threats and even elder fraud—are increasingly national and even international in scope,” Barr said to the crowd of 256 graduating students and the families they haven’t seen for more than two months. “This makes cooperation more important than ever. And it’s why the relationship and the shared understanding and the trust that are built here at the National Academy are also more important than ever.”

A central goal of the National Academy is to improve working relationships and personal networks across law enforcement agencies to better face challenges. To that end, Attorney General Barr used the occasion to remind students of the recent creation in the Department of Justice (DOJ) of a unit whose mission is to keep open the lines of communication between state and local law enforcement and DOJ.

The State and Local Law Enforcement Coordination Section, Barr said, “will focus exclusively on communications and cooperation with our state and local partners.”

National Academy students arrived 10 weeks ago from as far away as Bahrain and Finland. During a challenging curriculum and lively discussions about leadership, terrorism, community policing, and cybercrimes, they have formed bonds that will remain long after leaving Quantico. They came from six different continents but leave as part of a team.

“The members of class 276 represent every level of law enforcement—federal, state, and local,” Wray said. “But as I have often said, all of us in law enforcement serve on one team.” The National Academy was created in 1935 as the Police Training School with just 23 students. In the late 1930s, international students were invited to attend, but usually only a few per session. The numbers rose significantly in the 1960s when President John F. Kennedy signed a memorandum to boost international enrollment. The 35 international students in this session is the National Academy’s largest number ever.

“For more than 80 years,” said Wray, “this program has served as a bridge that connects state and local law enforcement to international law enforcement.” Domestically, Wray added, “The National Academy is a perfect example of how federal law enforcement can—and should—help our state and local partners to succeed.”

The culminating event for National Academy students, held earlier this week, was a grueling 6.1-mile obstacle run through the woods of Quantico, designed by the U.S. Marine Corps. The Yellow Brick Road, as it is called, challenges students to literally overcome obstacles and work together to get to the end. Finishers are rewarded with a bright yellow brick emblazoned with their session number. To date, more than 52,000 students from 170 countries have graduated from the National Academy.

"Your bricks don't just represent a challenge—they themselves are a challenge," Wray said. "It's up to you now to ensure that the network you see in this auditorium grows larger and stronger, and that the Yellow Brick Road grows longer and wider."
