FBI Director Lays Out Bureau's Stance on Artificial Intelligence at Cyber Threat Summit

Wray also explained how the FBI's FISA Section 702 authorities empower cyber efforts

During a July 26 keynote at the FBI Atlanta Cyber Threat Summit, Director Christopher Wray warned that cybercriminals are weaponizing artificial intelligence—and the resulting threat will only worsen as machine-learning models become increasingly sophisticated.

Wray also explained that the FBI's authorities under Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, enable our efforts to combat international cybercriminals. He identified 702-powered successes and stressed the urgency of reauthorizing that portion of the federal law.

Wray also discussed nation-state threats in cyberspace, noting that China, in particular, poses a formidable cyber threat, but Russia is not far behind.

Finally, he underscored the importance of public-private partnerships in securing the American people and economy from cyber threats.

"For 115 years (in fact, literally today—today is actually the FBI's birthday), the Bureau has been charged with protecting the American people and upholding the Constitution," he said. "And the men and women of the FBI work tirelessly every day to fulfill that mission—but we could not do it without partners—without partners like you," he said.

The Weaponization of Artificial Intelligence

Director Wray recently said the FBI is examining ways it can use artificial intelligence to help support its mission, such as by "triaging and prioritizing the mountains of data we collect in our investigations."

But during the summit, he warned that bad actors are exploiting machine-learning models to commit crimes.

The same generative AI technologies that can be used to save people time by automating tasks can also be used to "generate deepfakes or malicious code," he said.

As an example, he explained one case in which a darknet user allegedly created malware using a generative AI program. Wray said the user "then instructed other cybercriminals on how to use it to recreate malware strains and techniques based on common variants."

"And that's really just the tip of the iceberg," he continued. "We assess that AI is going to enable threat actors to develop increasingly powerful, sophisticated, customizable, and scalable capabilities—and it's not going to take them long to do it."

Wray said that the Chinese government is particularly well-positioned to use the increasing powers of AI and machine learning against the United States, especially in conjunction with data it has stolen from the United States.

FISA Section 702 Reauthorization

Director Wray said that the authorities granted to the FBI by Section 702 of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, are key to the Bureau's ability to crack down on cybercrime around the world.

Wray stressed that the FBI's Section 702 authorities only let it collect information on foreign targets of intelligence surveillance—and not U.S. citizens.

More than half of the FBI's data reporting under Section 702 has targeted cybercriminals, Wray said. And the Bureau's 702 authorities yielded 97% of the Bureau's "raw technical reporting on cyber actors" in the first half of 2023, he added.

"That's all intelligence that we can action through threat alerts and defensive briefings," he said.

Wray said the FBI's Section 702 authorities also powered cybersecurity wins, including:

Identifying the perpetrator of the 2021 Colonial Pipeline ransomware attack and recovering most of the $4.4 million ransom the company paid in response.

Saving an American non-profit organization who fell victim to a ransomware attack and recovering their data so they didn't need to give Iranian cybercriminals a dime.

Sniffing out attempts by Chinese cybercriminals to hack into an American transportation hub before they could wreak havoc.

"The intelligence we obtain through our 702 authorities is absolutely vital to safeguarding the American public and American businesses," he said. "Now, those of you who know me know that I'm not the kind of guy that is prone to overstatement, so when I say it's vital—it's not helpful, it's not important, it's vital—you know that I mean it."

Nation-State Threats
The FBI is also dealing with cyber threats posed by nation-states, Wray said, though it's not always obvious when a foreign government is responsible for a cyberattack.

"It's becoming increasingly difficult to discern where cybercriminal activity ends and nation-state activity begins, as the line between those two continues to blur," he said. Wray pointed to foreign intelligence agents who moonlight as cybercriminals and hackers who take on state-sponsored assignments on the side as evidence of this trend.

In terms of specific nation-state threats, Wray said China poses the largest-scale threat in cyberspace due to the amount of data it has stolen from the United States and the sheer size of its hacking program.
